Telephones such as these have historically been used in public areas for one-way communication.

In recent years these phones have proven to be useful for people with Alzheimer's, dementia, or any cognitive loss.

Incoming calls only telephones can help combat problematic behaviour:

- Eliminates the possibility of calling emergency services when they are not needed
- Stops individuals with cognitive loss from running up large telephone bills

Features

- 3 ringer volume settings: Off, low volume, and high volume
- Tone control: Yes
- Ringer off setting: Yes
- Hearing aid compatible: Yes

Ethical & Safety Warning

The landline telephone is the first device that people will attempt to use when they believe they are in trouble in their house.

This is why many people with memory impairment use the telephone on a regular basis, as they associate the landline telephone as a means of finding help or answers.

Restricting access to a telephone can be potentially dangerous, and is morally wrong in certain situations.

Therefore we strongly recommend that this telephone should only be used where there is 24 hour access to security or carers, for example in the following situations:

- In an individual's bedroom in a care home
- In flats/bedrooms in shared accommodation with a 24 hour reception
- As a telephone when living with family, friends, spouse, or carers

Additional Feature - Hotline Telephone

The Incoming Calls Only Telephone can also operate as a "hotline telephone" if connected to a PABX system. A hotline telephone will dial a single predetermined number when the handset is lifted from the base.

However, most customers do not need this feature & the phone comes with it deactivated.
